Marrakesh: Best Destination in the World 2015

8 Facts about Marrakech:

- Although the majority of residents are either Arabs or Amazigh, Marrakech is multi lingual: from business people to shopkeepers; most will be able to pin-point your nationality before you utter a single word.
- Djemma El Fna, is the ancient square that lies at the heart of Marrakech, and acts as a gathering point for locals, street performers such as dancers, musicians, and snake charmers, as well as street food vendors.

- Stroll around the streets of Marrakech and you will quickly discover that there are cats around every corner. Though the felines are rarely kept as pets, they are generally well fed. Some even take up residence in local shops.
- Marrakech is frequently referred to as the Red City, because of the shade of the walls surrounding its old town district.
- Marrakech was officially made a sister city of Scottsdale, Arizona, in January 2012. Their similarities? Both desert cities “share interests in climate, tourism, cultural heritage, and golf management.”
- In the middle of World War II, Winston Churchill begged Franklin D. Roosevelt to accompany him on a jaunt to Marrakech following the Casablanca Conference: “You cannot come all the way to North Africa without seeing Marrakech,” he said. “I must be with you when you see the sun set on the Atlas Mountains.” So the two set off on a 1943 journey, driving down from Casablanca. Churchill stayed a day longer, engaged in one of his favorite hobbies—painting. His canvas of the Atlas Mountains’ view ended up being the only artwork he painted during the war.
- If shopping is your game then the city’s souk district should be your aim. Explore the winding network of souk traders selling traditional pottery, metalwork, leather goods, textiles, spices and various other wares.
- Sweet mint tea is the national drink of Marrakech, while couscous, the traditional Berber dish of semolina (tiny granules of durum wheat) is the national dish—often served with fish, other meat, or veggies, in a broth-like sauce.
